On codeplex, I am working on a project and would like to compare the C# code to the original C# code so that I can see the differences. Can you tell me how to do this? Thanks. A: As stated by @EricWhite, you can use the tool c#faster to do the code comparison. Microsoft provides a complete comparison service for their.NET Framework SDK. You can find more information here. A: You can do it with Reflector. [Dosimetric evaluation and efficacy in predicting tumor control using single-fraction high-dose-rate brachytherapy]. For potential use in cervical brachytherapy, a dose-response curve for high dose-rate brachytherapy in the cervix has been established. An optimal dose-response relationship in colorectal cancer has been proposed. In both these studies, we compared tumor control after conventional fractionated irradiation with a single high-dose-rate brachytherapy fraction. With the use of a dedicated MOSFET dosimeter, we measured the dose delivered to 27 intracavitary high dose-rate applicators. In 23 intracavitary tumors, the R2 responses to varied fractions (1.5-6.0 Gy) and dose levels (40-90 Gy) were determined. In four intracavitary tumors, this response was confirmed with the use of a gamma-gamma camera. The results confirmed the optimal dose-response relationship and R2 ranges of 0.00 to 0.7 for doses below 40 Gy, and 0.75 to 1.0 for doses between 40 and 80 Gy. For doses between 80 and 90 Gy, tumor control was achieved in every case. It was concluded that single high-dose-rate brachytherapy of 20 Gy in a single fraction is the optimal dose. Tumor control can be achieved, even with doses of 60 to 80 Gy, if the dose is delivered in 2 fractions of 10 Gy (tumors below 5 cm).![(brmedchirj272275-0066){#sp1.322} ![(brmedchirj272275-0067){#sp2.323} 50b96ab0b6

To determine the incremental value of a full-screen colour Doppler (CFDS) system over standard B-mode ultrasonography (US) for the detection of deep vein thrombosis (DVT). Consecutive patients were recruited prospectively from general medical or orthopaedic inpatient wards and from out-patients attending the vascular laboratory. Each patient had both a standard B-mode US examination followed by a CFDS examination of the lower limbs. Sixty-two patients with acute or recent symptoms of DVT were examined. Fourteen (23%) of the 62 patients had DVT on US examination alone, while six (10%) had DVT on CFDS examination alone. Additional abnormal findings made during the same visit allowed immediate diagnosis in 23 (37%) of the 62 patients. Sensitivity and positive predictive value of the combination of techniques were 94% and 80%, respectively. Sensitivity and negative predictive value of the combination of techniques were 92% and 96%, respectively. CFDS is clinically useful for the detection of DVT. The majority of patients had additional findings which would have led to an earlier diagnosis of DVT. The results of the present study indicate that a negative CFDS examination does not exclude the diagnosis of DVT. Further studies in larger series of patients are required./* * Bootstrap Table Slovak translation * Author: Simon Fischer */ (function ($) { 'use strict'; $.fn.bootstrapTable.locales['sk-SK'] = { formatLoadingMessage: function () { return 'Prosím čakajte, nasledujúce štúdie boli vytvorené.
